She was almost enraged with herself for her reaction, but knew that there was more to it than that. The truth was that she was not upset over the marriage proposal, she had expected it and she had not thought that there would be any great trouble over her failure to immediately accept Edward. Perhaps she should have been more definite in her refusal, but of course the real problem lay elsewhere. Even thinking about it made her wish that she was walking through the garden with him, and even leading him into the drawing room so that they could look at the latest novel brought in from France. She wanted to be with him so much, and it seemed almost incredible to her that he was gone to London to find a wife from among the ton.
